Extracts for use with Section A.

Extract 1: From: Godfrey Hodgson, America in Our Time, published in 1978.

The probability of friction between the USA and the Soviet Union at the end of the Second World War grew out of the political systems and ideologies of the two countries. Both the Soviet Union and the United States in 1945 were ideologically expansionist powers. The men who controlled the Soviet Union, and the majority of Americans, each believed that their own political philosophy was the Truth. Each believed that in the end their Truth must be victorious. It could only be a matter of time before the two systems, each justified in its own view by political principle, came into conflict.

At Yalta, in February 1945, the Allies made the last of their wartime attempts to prevent quarrels over the political shape of the world after the war. However, almost immediately afterwards, Stalin gave signs that he would not abide by the agreements made over the future government of Poland. He had agreed to include democratic representatives but it soon became clear that Stalin intended that the government in Poland would be under his control. Before President Roosevelt died, even his determination to put the best view on Stalin's behaviour was shaken.

Before the war in Europe was over, the American Ambassador hurried from Moscow to warn President Truman that Stalin was breaking his agreements. He also went further, predicting a Russian invasion of Western Europe by America's Soviet ally.

Extract 2: From: Michael Dockrill, The Cold War 1945–1963, published in 1988.

Neither side had any real reason to fear the other in 1946. American army strength had fallen to 400,000 from a peak of 3.5 million in May 1945. The USA lacked sufficient atomic bombs to inflict a decisive blow on the Soviet Union. In any case, the American people were unlikely to support a new conflict so soon after the end of the Second World War.

American intelligence agents were well aware that the devastation inflicted on the Soviet economy by four years of ruinous war made it impossible for the USSR to consider fresh hostilities. Nor, of course, did Stalin seek a conflict. There was some alarm expressed in Western Europe at the presence of twenty Red Army divisions in Central Europe at a time when Western Europe's defences barely existed. Total Red Army strength was put at about 2.5 million in 1946. However, this was an exaggeration. The Soviet Union had demobilised rapidly after 1945, in order to release manpower for industrial reconstruction, and the size and strength of each Red Army division was overestimated.

Opinion in the US was not yet prepared to regard the Soviet Union as simply the enemy. This was shown by the hostile response in the US to Winston Churchill's speech made at Fulton, Missouri, March 1946, in which he talked of an 'iron curtain' having descended across Europe.
